NEW QUESTION: 1

A company is expecting a 50% increase in volume through one of their business processes. The current state model of the business process has already been created and verified through simulation. It is believed that the process will need to be updated in order to handle the increased throughput. A process analyst is performing "What-If" analysis upon a process model using simulation to solidify process knowledge. What approach should the process analyst first perform to aid in designing and verifying a future process design?

- A. 1. Identify tasks in the process that have resource shortages.
2. Update the process resource model by adding additional resources. These additional resources will be able to process the work faster than the current state business process.
- B. 1. Identify activities that can be converted to automated tasks.
2. Update the processing time for these activity to reflect a faster duration due to automation.
- C. 1. Create and simulate multiple future state design alternatives.
2. Use comparison dynamic analysis to verify which future state process provides the greatest impact on process improvement and throughput.
- D. 1. Perform threshold analysis on the validated current state process, by varying the token generation volume until the upper threshold of the current state model is determined.
2. Evaluate process results using dynamic analysis to determine where bottlenecks begin to occur and use as a focal point of identification of potential areas of process improvement.
